Preface

In this edition of the journal, a collection of themes is investigated touching upon a multiplicity of disciplines. The volume is organized in the form of an orchestrated spectrum that makes reference to linguistic, psychological, cultural, and translation themes that have direct impact on the quotidian FL classroom practices. It is evident that the aim of educational queries is to pour ready-made techniques in learning contexts where it is not evident that the process of teaching has proved successful. Hence, the major part of this issue turns around proposing solutions to specific difficulties both for students and instructors. Teaching the history of the FL community cannot be separated from the teaching of the linguistic aspects; thus a methodical approach has been proposed in the issue together with an adjacent idea that destabilises the smooth mechanism of FL teaching namely plagiarism. The latter has been exposed into analysis together with possible solutions. Not far from this, some papers discuss dilemmas related to the psychological foundation of losing interest in learning a FL with all the negative impacts this may carry on related disciplines. Some hindrances are shown to be traced back to the phenomenon of bilingualism that if not well controlled might lead students to lose their path through FL learning. The issue puts into exhibition a set of papers that shed light on those glitches. Principally, the issue devotes space to discuss the concern about language use in specific areas or for specific purposes through analyses of needs and results of already used methods. Psychological concerns are also exposed in the work of papers touching upon attitudes and opinions towards phenomena of code switching. Literary and historical inquiries are present as well summarised in the analysis of novels' pertinent issues and the recent history events in some areas together with the repercussions of those upheavals on indigenous populations. Lastly, the latent issues related to the four language skills are discussed as well shedding light on the imperative link between language skills that when well taken care of would lead to proficiency enhancement.
