Preface

The accelerating international developments summarized in the phenomenon of globalization have had serious repercussions on many life fields. Particularly, the domain of language studies is no exception. Academic quests about the integration of intercultural teaching within FL syllabi are covered in the present issue with special focus on ways, strategies, techniques, and challenges that might face both instructors and students in learning contexts. As known, the internet tool becomes so present in the current debates around FL teaching with all the light it may shed on assisting the path of language learning as well as matters related to translation issues. Technological advancement through media resources helps creating international linguistic societies; the latter phenomenon has led to the creation of new concerns most of them are being covered in the current issue. Historically speaking, the influence of the amalgamation of the geographically distant peoples leaves always a print on the forthcoming linguistic history of a certain society which results in pluri-linguistic communities, a topic of interest that has been devoted enough space equally. A secondary phenomenon that could be resulted from the co-existence of more than one language is the abrupt shift from one language to another within the same society for a variety of reasons. Translation problems come on top in similar contexts. For this sake, the issue exhibits a collection of research papers that constructively discuss and analyse the complexities to create a better translation environment. Not far from the linguistic domain, this edition clears up the shadows of translation activities on the field of literary studies with special focus on the impact of the translation activity on the interpretation of the Arabic literary text, aspects of financial translation, and the bearings of translation on the interpretation of the humourist text.
